Life....How Sweet It Is

As I lie on the damp, wet pavement, I realize that I took life for granted. I swam through difficulties and faced each challenge with my friends at my side. Even at the PokÃ©mon League finals, my friends were there, cheering me on. But now, the voices sound so far away.

I think about everything that I had faced over the past several years and look up into the faces of my friends. A soft hand comes down to smooth back my hair. The rain falls from the sky and hits the pavement and my face.

"You're going to be fine. I won't let you die..." I hear.

The voice was so far away. I wish to hold my memories dear...my years of training, my friends, my mother. And even Prof. Oak. I want them all to be here looking down at me. I want to say goodbye but I can't. Too may people, too little time. As my breath gets shorter, and my eyes begin to flutter, I realize just how sweet life is, but I took it for granted and now, I am paying the price.

As the wail of the ambulance gets louder and louder with each second, images of my life flash past my eyes. I try to focus on them and to remember if I ever survive. A voice of a paramedic cuts into my thoughts.

"You are going to be okay. Your injuries are serious, but not life-threatening." she said.

"Please. Please help him." I hear again.

With that, I close my eyes and whisper my last words.

"Pikachu pikapi."
